

Speaking With Authority eReport

A study conducted by AT&T and Stanford University revealed that the top predictor of professional success and upward mobility is how much you enjoy and how good you are at public speaking. Yet surveys also show that the number one fear of most adults (even above death) is speaking in public. Now there's a contradiction for you: The best thing for anyone's career is also what we most fear! In this eReport, I'm going to try to put that fear to rest. Because, in truth, the ability to speak confidently is not only one of the major underpinnings of charisma, it's also one of the most marketable skills you can acquire. Organizations continually seek individuals who can sell products, present proposals, report findings, and explain ideas effectively. It's no coincidence that more than half of Toastmasters clubs are in-house corporate or government groups. Audiences, accustomed now to slick media, are less tolerant than ever of marginal presentation skills. So the ante has been upped, the bar has been raised, on what level of public speaking is now needed to get your message across.
