Not illustrated. 1886 Excerpt: ...to have been that the local authorities endeavored to arrest two young men known to be hostile to the Government. The insurgents began by attacking at 11 A. M. the residence of the general commanding the troops of the district, and shot him on the spot. The garrison then retreated to the presidential palace, outside of the city gates; and the insurgents, thus finding themselves at liberty to do as they pleased, and wreak their vengeful feelings on other inhabitants whom they considered their enemies, fired on all such, causing a general stampede, until at 6 P. M., when, after three hours fighting, President Salomon succeeded in dispersing the assassins, who sought refuge in the consulates. At this juncture the President had lost control of his own troops, who, in common with the rabble, set fire to the town and plundered in all directions during the confusion. The British war-steamer Fantom landed a crew to protect the consulate, which the mob threatened to burn down. These dreadful scenes were prolonged till the afternoon of September 23d, when foreign ministers and consuls united in a protest, threatening the city and palace with bombardment by the men-of-war in the harbor, if order were not restored immediately; and the city became tranquil once more. The losses sustained by foreign merchants, notably French, by fire, were considerable, and in November the Haytian Government was informed that an indemnity would be exacted. Toward the close of October President Salomon issued another proclamation, in which he announced that the leader of the rebellion, Boyer Bazelais, had poisoned himself at Miragoane on the 27th of that month, after being wounded in an engagement at Gaoy on October 22d. During the rebellion there was a battle between the steamers Dessa...
