Not illustrated. 1825 Excerpt: ... Fifthly.--Method of clearing Wines made in cold Years, on which the common means have no effect. When the summer is cold and rainy, the grapes ripen with difficulty, frequently some are rotten, before the others are ripe. The wine consequently, devoid of spirit, corrupts quickly, and will not clear however often you attempt it. A mixture with good wines may correct this, but it takes a great deal to produce a satisfactory result. When a wine will not clear for the above mentioned reason, draw foity or fifty pints of wine from a cask of 260 bottles, bring thirty or forty pints to a boil, and return it boiling into the cask, clear at the same time with six whites of eggs, and stir the liquor as before. The cask must not be filled higher than within two inches of the bung. Bung it, without knocking it in. The wine is not tardy in fermenting, and will be perfectly clear in a few days. If you have a great many casks in this state, you may heat the cellar sufficiently to produce fermentation, and to increase the alcohol. This method is adopted in Germany in cold years. White wines do not ferment in the tub, but ought immediately in the cask, when they fail, you must clear them with isinglass as I have directed. Sixthly.--Method of clearing White Wines that have not worked. Wines that have not worked are thick, and preserve a long time an unpleasant sweet taste (they bear a great consumption under the name of sweet wine). The lees mixing with the liquid give a disagreeable color and clammy taste, it will sell better if it is cleared. The following method will restore it: place the cask on a stand, that you may easily rack it, bore the end in three different places, and put in three taps. One in the usual place, another, distant one third the size of the end of ...
