The dividing line between getting approved or declined for credit is clearly measured by one important thing: your credit score. In todays lending system, the significance of your credit score has increased because of the convenience offered by technology. Now, it takes only a few seconds for a credit application to be approved or to be declined. However, like in all organized societies, not everyone is endowed with the same credit score. Within the lines that divide economic and social classes, differences in credit scores arise. Then again, this difference is heavily influenced by the individual because he is the sole manager of his finances, and whatever he does will have an effect on his credit score.

What then happens if an individuals score is problematic? What can an individual do in order to start fixing it? What tools does an individual have that help in credit repair? These are the essential questions answered in this book. As you go through the simplified discussions, you will realize that the very first thing an individual needs to have to repair his credit is willingness to do so. Without willingness, change will not progress. The next thing is proper information. Credit repair is well-ingrained in the financial side of things, and a lot of concepts need to be simplified so that ordinary people will understand what they mean. What follows after proper information is assessment of the individuals financial condition and identifying the tools he has so he can start the journey towards recovery.
