

Fathers and Mothers

Aldo Naouris thesis is that in Western societies the father has been ejected from his central position in the family structure, and although the mothers role has been heightened, the child has now replaced the father at the top of the family pyramid, damaging the development of the child. Naouri argues that the evolution of our species gave the father a central role to play in his childs development, endowing the child with the consciousness of time, balancing the mothers natural tendency to satisfy without delay every need of a child she could scarcely imagine was no longer a part of her. Given the fathers diminished role, how can todays child acquire an awareness of time? Perhaps, says Naouri, infant care must be entirely re-examined, because it was based on the recommendations of pediatricians whose bias was overly maternal.

So how do the parenting styles of fathers and mothers differ, and how can we blend them in a family to benefit the children as they grow up and prepare for life? In some families, mothers can be more demanding and fathers more nurturing. But the essential key is balancing the
