

Growing Up Green: Stick Horses and Football

During the turbulent 1960s and 1970s, a boy lived the kind of childhood that has pretty much disappeared from the American scene. He started life on a 26,000-acre wildlife area and later roamed on a 40-acre playground complete with a creek for swimming and hills for sledding. His adventures and misadventures are told in this letter to his children. SO come along on this tale of riding stick horses, jumping a creek on a bicycle, sledding down hills on killer sleds, and playing high school football. Warning: Some things in the book may be hard for animal lovers to read. This story takes place on a farm where animals were raised and slaughtered to feed the family. Being poor farm kid in the 1970s, the author found a way to make a little money by trapping and selling the pelts. While not graphic, the section on his trapping adventures may be disturbing to some.
