

Low Life: The Spectator Columns

Taking over from the late Jeffrey Bernard, Jeremy Clarke has been the Low Life columnist for the London Spectator - the oldest weekly magazine in the English-speaking world - since 2001. He was diagnosed with cancer in April 2013. A week after I was told, believing that I didnt have long to live, I went to Butlins. If the two Butlins columns collected here have a peculiar or elegiac tone, thats why. Indeed, the columns in this selection were all written post-diagnosis. Nearly two years later, to the disappointment of my friends, Im still here. Reaching down inside my trousers to feel my testicles as I write, they are roughly the size of garden peas. The hormone treatment has caused them to wither on the vine. Otherwise Im cheerful. In fact, Ive never been happier. True story.
