

Making the Best of It: Building on the Bonds Between Parents and Adult Children

Parents and their children are important to each other throughout a lifetime but that does not mean to say that the relationships are always smooth. While their bonds may be close or distant, loving or troubled they are rarely indifferent. As children grow into independence, pursuing their own interests and loves, as parents lose the daily preoccupation of children at home, all face challenges in the way they relate to each other. This book addresses the landmarks and difficulties that occur between parents and their adult children and suggests ways of dealing with them. Some changes, such as children's marriages and grandchildren, are faced by most people and generally welcomed, some bring unhappiness, such as family feuds, and still others, such as hurt feelings, are commonplace. As they let go of being the primary people in their grown children's lives, parents have to try to forego some lifelong habits. Advice, for example, becomes less often appropriate or even relevant. And both parents and children are wise to be respectful and polite to new family members even if they cannot like them. The author is an able and experienced guide for those who find themselves perplexed in their efforts to have a nurturing and supportive relationship with the members of their family. She demonstrates that with good intent, with some personal awareness and love, parents and adult children can do much to create the kind of bond that is enriching and fulfilling for all.
