

Windows, Doors and Paths: Things I Would Not Say to You

Reflections never cease to amaze me; sometimes my face looks like a little child, other times a tired old woman. Windows are important throughout life times. When I was little, I looked out wishing I was out there and not in here. As a teen, I wanted them shut, looking for my personal space and my privacy. As a young married woman I wanted them clean and polished for the neighbors, for light, for looking into another world; young mothers need windows to watch their children and the neighborhood. Doors are important for people to leave and return, and have freedom to do so. Paths are where our curiosity takes us and our goals and destiny are met most often. Self-help books came and went, counseling joined in, I learned to be a better parent and a better person, but perhaps not a better wife. To do so would have annihilated my core. I tried to meet me head-on, counseling, counseling groups, self-help groups, groups and classes and more groups. My first marriage ended, the last 5 years of the 18 years being the best it had been. Yes, it still ended. Not until I was married for a 2nd time, and the kids were all grown (who also went to their groups) did I end up on 13 acres in a pine forest 25 miles from town and no vehicle out. There, I met myself with A course in Miracles in hand and I began to grow into the people I admired around me. My ancestors, my grandparents, my maternal Grandmother, my Mother, my Step-Father, who was the nicest man I ever knew, outside one of my counselor, Howard, in early days. Life is good and getting better every day. I am now at a point in my life where the gift of the present is with me, and I can open it and look at it every morning. I have the gift of time to roam about and see things and maybe not enjoy them as much until I got home and looked at the pictures, and that was o.k. Those paths are hard on old bones that I don't understand because this body has never been this old before. With age comes a loving disinterest in what is go
