Not illustrated. 1915 Excerpt: ...it refers to the man having actual charge of a gang of men on some specified work regardless of what his title may be. The title supervisor as used refers to the official having general supervision of work over a considerable territory and having charge of several gangs. He may be known on different roads as supervisor, superintendent of bridges and buildings, engineer, master carpenter or one of several other similar titles. Details to Be Kept in Time Book. The usual practice seems to be for the gang foreman to enter in a time book for each day the time allowed for each man, with overtime and sufficient information to enable a distribution and the prescribed reports to be prepared. Very few roads require any more detail than the title of the job and possibly a few subdivisions. The majority of the roads in the country use monthly or semi-monthly time books except in a few states where weekly payments are required by law, necessitating the use of weekly time books. These time books vary from the small stock book which can be bought in stationery stores to a monthly diary giving a complete record of labor and material, an outline of the work done, a tool report and other general information required from the foreman. It would seem desirable that a time book should be adopted of a size readily carried in the pocket and properly ruled to show one months or one weeks time as conditions may require. On a large road it would not seem desirable, however, to combine all of the foremans monthly reports in one book, as such a book would be very cumbersome both for the foreman and for the clerks who handle the accounts. The committee recommends a time book using one double page for the time and distribution for each man. The last page of this book should give a rec...
