The Simplest Measure of Presentation Success In our modern world, the simplest measure of presentation effectiveness is the answer to one question: Is the audience leaning in to listen, or are they tuning out to text? If people are leaning in, they're engaged. The greater the level of engagement, the better the presenter's chances of success. If they're texting, they're disengaged. By definition, those texting cannot be listening. They've tuned out. Have Your Audiences Leaning in to Listen Author Eric Bergman has written a new book to help you have your audiences leaning in for more. In 108 easy-to-read pages, The Engaging Public Participation Presentation takes readers through a step-by-step process to create conversational presentations that enhance engagement, understanding and support. Readers learn the value of delivering their presentations conversationally, regardless of the formality of the situation or the size of the audience. They learn it's much more valuable to use visuals as an aid, than a crutch. And they understand why answering questions is truly the secret ingredient to delivering engaging presentations that directly support business and communication objectives. While it was written to support the values of the International Association for Public Participation (IAP2), the lessons here can improve every presentation from sales presentation to keynote address. If you'd like to develop interesting, relevant presentations that have your audiences leaning in for more, this book was written for you.
