United States. A nother at St. Louis November 3, 1804, by William Henry Harrison with the united Sac and Fox tribes, when they were received as such into friendship and protection. They also ceded their lands in northern Illinois and southern Wisconsin, retaining the mere right to hunt thereon so long as the lands remained the property of the United States, taking the guarantee of the government against invasion of such right and against the invasion of the other lands of which they retained title. At Portage de Sioux, Missouri, September 13, 1815, William Clark, Ninian Edwards and Auguste Chouteau concluded a treaty with a branch of the Sac nation at the time and later denominated as the Sacs of the Missouri. The Indians avowed friendship with the United States during the late war (of 1812) and the necessity for their withdrawal, on that account, from the Sacs of the Mississippi. There were acknowledgments of the restoration of friendly relations and a reaffirmance of the terms of the Treaty of 1804. At St. Louis May 13, 1816, the same commissioners concluded a treaty with such of the Sacs as were not embraced in the one last mentioned. Peace with Great Britain was stated and expressly ratified, friendly relations acknowledged and the Treaty of 1804 reaffirmed. At Washington August 4, 1824, William Clark concluded the treaty with the Sac and Foxes, by which they ceded all their lands in the State of Missouri, reserving for the halfbreeds of their nations the small tract of land lying between the rivers Desmoin and the Mississippi and the section of the above (Missouri) line. At Prairie du Chien August 19, 1825, a treaty was concluded by William Clark and Lewis Cass with the Sac and Foxes, Sioux and others, determining tribal as well as government boundaries. A line was established on the south side of which the Sac and Foxes, and on the north the Sioux, re(Typographical errors above
