

The Emerald Cat

Antique furniture fraud, international travel, work commitments, Ashley Brookes is taking them all in stride. What she's tripping up on is the enigmatic Jack Knight. He's supposed to be helping, but mainly just pushes her buttons and knows more than he should. Following leads to another continent might be too far though. She's an architect, not a detective. When a worried friend asks if she'll at least be accompanied by Jack, what is Ashley supposed to say? Their relationship is complicated. So complicated in fact that she's not sure they even have one. Whether he shaves his beard, keeps his subtle accent, or throws her for a loop with some fake story, Jack seems plenty mad that she won't drop it already. Then again, maybe he's worried about something she's forgetting. Even if antique furniture fraud hardly seems dangerous, and comical crooks perform the actual switches, there's a shady someone out there calling the shots. For all she knows that person could be watching, waiting, and possibly meaning both her and Jack harm.
