

The Evanescence of Demons: Mindfulness as a tool of Science

From page one this work assumes that reading is animal responsiveness. It presents a psychological model which suggests that the same inside (mental) responding that assists in digesting and comprehending words is as likely to overlay consciousness in a manner that subverts understanding. Mindfulness in reading, although seldom discussed, is vital to reading what one is reading, alongside reading what comes up inside in response to the words. It is argued here that a practice of mindfulness, in enhancing skill at seeing covert responding as such in situ, may enhance not only reading, but the full spectrum of any scientific endeavor. It is further argued that to see the true value of mindfulness, one must understand humans, and that our best understanding of humans comes from rigorously systematic science. Yet to understand science and best apply the method, one must understand humans, and the patterns of mindfulness, whether labeled as such or not, must be present in the science used to gain that understanding. Science without such clarity, it will be argued, is easily derailed by the perception-altering demons that, if not recognized as they arise inside, can form the wormhole through which perception is transported into illusion.
